Promise Land history is rich

By FRANCES ASBETT

It was in the late 1950's that the idea of Promise Land Baptist Church was born, in the heart and mind of the late Rev. Elias Simmons.

Simmons opened his home to a group of community friends each Wednesday and Saturday evening for prayer meetings. On the second and fourth Sundays in each month his home was used for prayer and praise services.

The more the group met, the clearer it became to Simmons that the community needed a church. He didn't mind using his home but the number of participants was continually growing and he knew that an organized church was the need.

The late James Pollard and M.P. Gibson, both licensed to preach, were often in charge of the Sunday gatherings. The people attending listened and rejoiced in the opportunity to praise God for his goodness.

According to church history, most of the people who attended these services were not educated. A number could not read or write. A few who could read were ready and willing to read the Bible to the assembled group.

Singing praises made up a large part of the worship services. Worshippers would often sing three or four hymns in medley fashion. Singing chants was one way they had of expressing their praise to God and everybody shouted.

These people enjoyed this meeting, felt uplifted, and inspired by the worship but were often critized by many who called the shouting dancing.

Although the criticism was hard to take, it did not hinder the spirit of these people. They kept meeting, praying, singing and shouting. They were convinced that God knew their hearts and their intention.

Finally in one of the meetings they decided that God was leading them to think of organizing a church. It was decided that a committee be appointed to attend the association and get some advice on the proposed church. The committee was composed of Rev. Simmons, Rev. Pollard, Rev. Gibson, Deacon Jesse Hunter, Deacon Jesse Hunter, Sr., Deacon Jesse Hunter, Jr., Deacon Jesse Hunter, III, Deacon Jesse Hunter, IV, Deacon Jesse Hunter, V, Deacon Jesse Hunter, VI, Deacon Jesse
